Canal access essential after seeing story

4 Aug 1995

When the city of Orem proposed bridging the Murdock Canal late last year, the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation and the Provo River Water Users Association said they needed 24-hour access to the canal banks for emergencies and to operate various valves on the waterway.

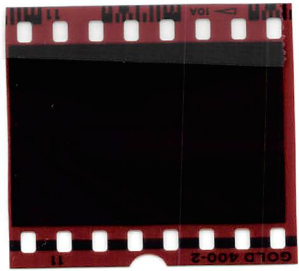

The BOR strongly defended this position when the city prematurely opened the bridge but closed off the canal with cyclone fencing to keep children out until electric gates could be installed.

But, the BOR did not stumble across the fence on their own. Instead, they learned about it by reading a story about the opening in The Daily Herald, five days after the city closed off the canal bank.
